(Oral Argument by Counsel)

THE COURT: All right, counsel, I'm going to give a ruling on this motion and my ruling is going to be pretty brief, not as long as some have been in the past. In this particular instance the Washington State Democratic Central Committee have filed a motion in limine to exclude the petitioners' attribution of illegal votes, and I understand after reading these materials, because it was not necessarily a term that was familiar to me, that this attribution argument has various names. It can be attribution. It's also called proportional analysis, proportionate deduction. It's called statistical analysis, and I think as one of the petitioners' experts has referred to it as perhaps even ecological inference.

At its most basic, the Court understands, the use of this methodology would purportedly show that if the illegal votes are apportioned between Mr. Rossi and Ms. Gregoire and deducted from their totals, the result would show that Mr.

Rossi received more legal votes than Ms. Gregoire. The intervenors in this case ask the Court, by motion in limine, to exclude this evidence of statistical analysis and, in essence, reject the theory. I'm not going to summarize the arguments that have been made in support of and opposition to this motion because we've heard those this morning. I will say that the intervenors assert that such evidence is inconsistent with the standard of proof required to invalidate an election.

The Court concludes that neither specifically has our state legislature, nor our courts established any guidelines in this particular area. Decisions of courts from other states to include, I would note, California and Idaho have resulted in mixed opinions. Some favor the admission of such evidence and some reject such evidence. Based on the review of the statutes, the out-of-state cases, including Hill v.

Howell in our state, and the arguments that have been made both orally and in writing to the Court, the Court's going to deny the intervenor's motion in limine in this case to exclude this evidence subject, of course, to a Frye hearing, if one is requested.

However -- and this is an important however. The denial of this motion should not be interpreted as a pretrial ruling adopting the statistical analysis methodology, so everyone understands that, and that's the ruling of the Court.

Any questions? The next motion the Court would like to take up is whether crediting files are admissible.

(Oral Argument by Counsel)

THE COURT: This motion before the Court has been brought by the intervenors and it is a motion in limine to exclude evidence of what's called voter crediting and to require the petitioners to introduce the so-called best evidence of voting. And as we've heard and as I've read, the intervenors here allege that the petitioners intend to rely on so-called voter registration files to prove that the individual illegal voters actually voted. One of our election contest statutes is RCW 29A.68.110 dealing with illegal votes and that statute provides that no election may be set aside on account of illegal votes unless it appears that an amount of illegal votes has been given to the person whose right is being contested that, if taken from that person, would reduce the number of the person's legal votes below the number of votes given to some other person for the same office after deducting therefrom the illegal votes that may be -- that may be shown to have been given to the other person.

In response, the Court understands the petitioners here to say that there are in excess, I think, of at least a thousand votes cast by persons who were disqualified either because they were felons who had not been re-enfranchised, by persons who cast more than one vote or because ballots were cast in the names of deceased persons. And I also understand there is an argument that there are hundreds of provisional ballots improperly put in tabulating machines without verifying that the ballots were from lawfully registered voters who had not already voted. Counsel have talked about the statute and the statute actually is 29A.08.125 and the petitioners argue that the voter crediting records are indeed competent evidence of the fact that a person voted because those records are required to be maintained by the auditor pursuant to this particular statute and, indeed, that statute does require the auditors to maintain these particular records.

But although these records, I think, are certainly admissible under our rules of evidence, the process of crediting voters with having voted is a post-election administrative exercise that this Court determines does not bear upon the authenticity of election results and because of that, the Court grants the intervenor's motion and, therefore, the Court will require that any party, whether it be the petitioners or the intervenors, who allege that there have been illegal votes, they're going to be required to use the poll book page signed by the voter or a provisional ballot envelope signed by the voter which was submitted presumably at the time or an absentee ballot envelope. Any questions, counsel? Folks, let's take the morning recess for about 15 minutes and then we'll take up. I think we can finish these motions this morning.

(Oral Argument by Counsel)

THE COURT: All right. There are actually two motions before the Court. They are, if I can use the word, companion The first is the petitioners' motion to clarify the burden of proof with respect to illegal votes, and the counter motion brought by the intervenors is a motion in limine to exclude evidence of petitioners' illegal convicted felon voters. The Court understands, first, that the petitioners intend to offer evidence of votes which were cast by felons who were disqualified from voting under the Washington State Constitution and that the argument is that upon a prima facie showing by the petitioners that a voter is a felon and that court records do not reflect any restoration of civil rights that the respondents should be -- should bear the burden of showing that the felon's civil rights have been restored through either a certificate of discharge issued by the felon's sentencing court or some other paperwork and that absent such a showing by the respondents here, the intervenors, that the Court should deem the felon's vote illegal and invalid.

The companion motion filed by the intervenors is this, that the intervenors assert in their motion in limine that the Court should exclude all evidence of illegal felon voters unless the petitioners can prove six elements. One, that the -- that the vote was -- that the voter was convicted as an adult, that the voter was convicted of a felony, that the voter had not been given a deferred sentence, that the voter had not been discharged pursuant to RCW 9.94A.637, that is, not had their civil rights restored. Fifth, that the voter cast a ballot in the 2004 general election and finally, number six, that the voter marked the ballot to indicate a vote for a gubernatorial candidate.

This, the Court recognizes, is an important decision, as are all of these decisions we're dealing with today and as well as those that have preceded today's hearing. And as the Court was going through these motions and as I was lying in bed last night, I had one of the fears that I think attorneys have had often, I'm sure, did I miss something. Am I going to get in court and realize that there is an issue that I just completely overlooked. Mr. Foreman started out his presentation a few minutes ago with the burden of proof argument, that is, is it by a preponderance of the evidence or is it clear, cogent and convincing evidence. And in actuality, I hadn't anticipated specifically that that argument was before the Court, based on the written materials that the Court had been presented. I'll make a ruling. If counsel wish, however, to readdress the issue, I invite counsel to do that.

First with respect to the petitioners' motion here, the Court's going to deny petitioners' motion and I do so for the following reasons: Evidence of a felony conviction, coupled with the absence of a certificate of discharge in a court file, in this Court's mind does not establish a prima facie case of illegal felon voting, and the Court concludes that really based upon the reasoning provided by the Secretary of State in their written materials.

Secondly, the burden of proof, this Court concludes, rests with the party contesting the election and that burden of proof does not shift. The reasons the burden of proof does not shift is grounded in both our case law as well as our statutes, and the Court, of course, as are counsel, we're all mindful that the courts of this state presume the certified results of an election to be valid unless the contrary is clearly established. And unless an election is clearly invalid, when the people have spoken their verdict should not be disturbed by the courts.

Pursuant to RCW 29A.08.810, the registration of a person as a voter is presumptive evidence of his or her right to vote. And pursuant to RCW 29A.08.820, when a voter's registration is challenged before an election, the burden of proving that he or she is improperly registered rests with the challenger and must be proved by clear and convincing evidence. The same standard should apply when election results are contested under 29A.68.020. Inasmuch as voting is a constitutional right, no vote should be held illegal and discounted absent clear proof that the voter was legally disenfranchised.

Now as to the intervenor's motion in limine to exclude evidence of petitioners' erroneously listed illegal convicted felon voters, specifically the Washington State Democratic Central Committee argues that the petitioners must show evidence of the six elements that I've referenced to prove that an illegal felon actually voted. The Court's decision with respect to this motion in limine to exclude this evidence The Court's going to deny that motion and the Court is this. does so for the following reasons: First, our law instructs that the Court should only grant a motion in limine if the Court is able to determine that the evidence is clearly inadmissible based on the issues. And here, the evidence discussed in the intervenor's motion may be insufficient but it is not clearly inadmissible.

Now, counsel, I recognize that you're asking for some guidance from the Court so I'll offer the following to you. To the extent that both the petitioners as well as the intervenors seek clarification as to the evidence which must be established to demonstrate that an illegal felon voted, the Court instructs that the following elements should be established to the extent that these elements can be established. One, that the individual was convicted as an adult and was not adjudicated as a juvenile. Number two, that the individual was convicted of a felony, not a misdemeanor or a gross misdemeanor. Number three, that the individual was not given a deferred sentence. Number four, that the individual has not had his or her civil rights restored in one of the five ways described by the Secretary of State. Number five, that the individual cast a ballot in the 2004 general election and, number six, that they marked the ballot to indicate a vote for a gubernatorial candidate.

Now, based on this Court's ruling with respect to voter crediting, evidence that a particular person voted should be based upon the poll books and the ballot envelopes. And with respect to this last element, element number six, that there should be evidence that an individual marked a ballot for a gubernatorial candidate, the Court is mindful that it has not precluded petitioners from introducing evidence of attribution conditioned on a Frye hearing. And although these determinations are obviously inconsistent and ultimately may be mutually exclusive, whichever party intends to convince the Court that illegal felons voted should present all of the evidence available, if any, as to element number six.

One of the cases that we have talked about for quite a while now the last several months is Foulkes v. Hayes and in that case our Supreme Court talks about the inability to come up with the smoking gun. I recognize that and it just may be simply impossible to come up with all of these elements I've referred to and particularly element number six. I'm simply indicating you folks should come up with all that you have.

With respect to and responding to Mr. Foreman as to simply what is the burden of proof, I'm going to say it's clear and convincing. And I understand the Secretary of State's argument. I'm mindful of the cases. I've read the statutes and I think that is the appropriate burden but, Mr. Foreman, if your folks disagree with that, I mean, I would encourage specific briefing just as to that issue, but at this time that's the Court's ruling.

Now, I want to go one step further, counsel, and this is not by invitation necessarily but I think by necessity, and I certainly don't intend to mischaracterize anybody's argument here and specifically the petitioners' argument, but there is a theme that I sometimes see as I read these materials and the theme is this -- or the issue is this. May an election be invalidated where the number of illegal votes exceed the margin of victory, and I don't know if the petitioners intend to pursue that simple issue because it's simple to state. But I want to address it now so we can get it out of the way. And so because it's the Court's impression that petitioners may continue to argue that they do not have to prove which party was credited with an illegal vote, under some of our case law, particularly Foulkes v. Hayes and Hill v. Howell, this is the Court's reasoning.

While petitioners' arguments in this regard may be persuasive, Washington's election contest statutes clearly require the contestant to show illegal votes or misconduct changed the election result based on RCW 29A.68.110 and .070. And neither the Hill case nor the Foulkes case mentioned these specific statutes and in both of those cases where fraud was shown, the Court may set aside the election without requiring proof that the result was changed. The contestants in Foulkes did not allege illegal votes had been counted but, rather, that properly cast ballots had been fraudulently altered. And under these facts, our Supreme Court held the trial court had correctly overturned the election without proof the result had been affected.

Similarly, in Hill the Court required proof illegal votes changed the result, but in doing so remarked in somewhat contradictory dicta that such a showing might not be required where fraud, intimidation or a fundamental disregard of the law had occurred. Also, there is an out-of-state case, the Gooch case from Florida where the California court -- I'm sorry, Florida. Out of California. The California court interpreted a statute almost identical to our 29A.68.110 to not require proof the result was changed where a candidate's organization had engaged in large scale voter fraud. But in our case here today, the petitioners have never alleged, to the Court's knowledge, or even alluded to fraud or voter intimidation. The only case where a Washington court did not require proof of causation was Foulkes and that case involved fraud.

The rule urged by petitioners may be a wise one and a tempting choice for the Court. However, the Washington legislature has, by enacting RCW 29A.68.110 and .070, removed this choice from this Court's discretion. The statutory command is clear and the Court should not invalidate the election upon proof the number of illegal votes exceeded the margin of victory. If the Supreme Court wishes to clarify Hill's fundamental disregard exception to the causation requirement, then they certainly, as we all know, will have the opportunity to do that. Any questions, counsel, Mr. Foreman, Ms. Durkan?

MR. FOREMAN: No, Your Honor.

MS. DURKAN: No, Your Honor.

THE COURT: Mr. Even?

MR. EVEN: No, Your Honor.

(Oral Argument by Counsel)

THE COURT: All right. The motion before the Court is this. It's the petitioners' motion in limine to exclude evidence concerning what are called previously rejected ballots and other offsetting errors and to clarify the limited scope of the intervenor's evidence here. And as one might imagine, as so often happens, from the time of the filing of such a motion and the response, the focus changes somewhat and it's the Court's perception that that has occurred here.

Originally the focus, I understand, of petitioners' motion was to preclude, by motion in limine, the intervenors from presenting evidence of what I would call signature mismatches or rehabilitation of signatures or comparison of each provisional ballot envelope signature to a voter registration, but I understand that in response to that, intervenors indicate that they do not intend to engage or present evidence of signature mismatches or rehabilitation of signatures or even comparison of provisional ballot or absentee ballot envelopes with voter registrations. I'll take them at their word.

Intervenors indicate here that they, however, do intend to offer evidence of errors that deprived voters of their vote where those folks who voted had timely submitted their ballots and all requested information to the election officials and they argue specifically that various election officials, particularly in King County, I think, failed to compare signatures and some rejected ballots because the officials failed to include a copy of the signatures on their voter registration database and could not find the voters' original registrations. Other instances, I think, the intervenors discuss would be that the intervenors allege that other errors occurred that may have led King County to reject provisional ballots which actually should have been accepted if there had simply been a signature comparison, and there are some other arguments that are more particular to Eastern Washington.

The Secretary of State here argues this, and it really is, in part, I think, in response to Mr. Maguire's argument made this morning because the focus of the oral argument, I think, is CR 24(c), that is, the intervenors are sandbagging. And in response in their written materials, the Secretary of State argues that the provisions of our election contest statute require the effect of illegal votes and election contest errors on both the winner and the runner-up be considered in order to fully address which candidate received the highest number of lawfully cast votes. And the Court agrees with that proposition, in essence, and because the Court agrees with that, the Court's going to deny the petitioners' motion in this regard.

I think it has been fairly clear from the beginning that the intervenors intended to present some evidence that would offset some of the petitioners' evidence and although the specifics of that may not have been known until recently, I think that the spirit of our election contest statute has to offset somewhat Civil Rule 26(c) and so the Court's going to

The Court's going to deny the petitioners' motion, rule this. but having denied the motion, the Court will make this observation, that the definition of illegal votes and election errors applies to any evidence that the intervenors may seek to admit and if the petitioners believe at trial that such evidence as intervenors may seek to admit is improper under the election contest statute, then petitioners should interpose an objection at that time. So, Mr. Maguire, any questions about that? MR. MAGUIRE: No, Your Honor, thank you. THE COURT: Mr. Burman? MR. BURMAN: No, Your Honor. THE COURT: Mr. Even, any questions? MR. EVEN: No, Your Honor.
